1. During the process of acquiring proficiency in the technique of drawing and painting, the imaginative faculty of students is sometimes left undeveloped, to such an extent, that when a reasonable amount of dexterity has been attained, imagination is lacking, both as regards design and pictorial work in general. How can this be rectified, and to what extent do you consider it desirable that the faculty should be encouraged in students, at all stages of their development?

2. Outline a course of instruction in still-life painting. Give examples of the first four lessons. As composition is one of the factors in the correct arrangement of a group, state how you would instruct the student in this branch of the subject; also illustrate as you would on the black-board, examples of a few of the general principles.

3. In teaching art appreciation with the aid of good reproductions of pictures by old and modern masters, the students find it difficult to understand how it is possible to appreciate at the same time the works of both. How would you explain this possibility and on what basis is just appreciation founded?

4. Outline a course of six lessons in modelling, suitable for beginners. Make a sketch of one of the exercises, and with brief notes, describe the method of procedure you would advocate to the student.

5. Discuss shading under the following aspects:—

- (a) As a means to express solidity of form without having recourse to the exact rendering of tone and tone-values.
- (b) Used for the purpose of full-tone studies, viz., a truthful rendering of the subtle variations of Light and Shade.

Under which heading do you consider it appropriate to introduce shading in object-drawing? When should a student commence to use shading? Describe the various methods of shading that can be used, and indicate how and to what extent the various media (pencil, chalk, charcoal and stump) influence the character of the drawing.

What degree of importance would you attach to technique when judging the merits of a drawing? In all cases give reasons for your answers.

6. Discuss the importance of the study of colour to students engaged in the following occupations:—Painting and Decorating, Cabinet-making, Stained-glass Designing, Costume and Dress Designing, Embroidery and Textile Designing and Commercial Art. Indicate any differences in the method of treating the subject which you consider desirable to make in order to suit the requirements of each type of student.
