In the course of a busy gardening schedule, we are seldom satisfied with mere flowers. We continually in search of new and interesting plants for our gardens, seeking out those that not only add beauty but also provide a sense of achievement. It is often a delightful experience to find a plant that is new to you or that you have not yet explored in depth.

There are many plants that are perfect for urban gardens with limited space. One of our favorites is Linaria purpurea (toadflax), an annual wildflower that grows to between 80 cm and 1.5 m high. It bloomed with vibrant color all season, with its tiny purple snapdragon flowers. Italian wildflower that grows to between 80 cm and 1 m high. Another great choice is Knautia macedonica (cotton-lace), which I mentioned earlier. This plant is very easy to grow, and its relatives also bear interesting flowers. The cultivar, ‘Canon Went’, has shell-pink stamens, which I mentioned earlier. This plant is very easy to grow, and its relatives also bear interesting flowers. For a scatter of cupcakes look, but not if you're trying for a wild-ish and convivial feel. There's often a plant that you can use to protect something I want to eat. The South African Wild rose is a plant that is so versatile. It usually arrives uninvited in gardens, and is often considered a weed. I love it, for its spikes of tiny purple snapdragon flowers. The poppies will reliably self-seed one to a narrow border, and go for hardworking mainly upright plants for a long summer display.

Big strides have been made in regulating the booming private rented sector, but there's still plenty of work to do on improving the conditions for tenants and landlords.
