To Tackle the Housing Crisis, we Need to Talk About Ownership

Lorcan Sirr

Technological University Dublin, lorcan.sirr@dit.ie

Follow this and additional works at: https://arrow.dit.ie/beschrecmed

Part of the Urban, Community and Regional Planning Commons, and the Urban Studies and Planning Commons

Recommended Citation

Sirr. L. (2016) To tackle the housing crisis, we need to talk about ownership. The Sunday Times 17.07.2016.

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-Share Alike 3.0 License
For decades, Ireland has been a world leader in sustainable and organic gardening. However, in recent years, the country has experienced a decline in the number of gardeners, leading to concerns about the future of this valuable cultural and environmental asset.

The decline in gardening can be attributed to several factors, including increased urbanisation, changes in lifestyle, and a perceived decrease in the value of community gardens. Moreover, the rise of technology and social media has led many people to spend less time outdoors and more time indoors, which has contributed to a decline in the popularity of gardening.

However, there is hope for the future of gardening in Ireland. With the increasing focus on sustainability and the environmental movement, gardening is once again becoming popular. Many people are turning to gardens as a way to connect with nature and reduce their carbon footprint. Additionally, the COVID-19 pandemic has led to a renewed interest in gardening as a way to improve mental health and connect with nature.

In conclusion, while there may be challenges for the future of gardening in Ireland, there is also hope for its continued growth and importance. By promoting the benefits of gardening and encouraging people to get involved, we can ensure that this valuable cultural and environmental asset continues to thrive for generations to come.

References: