Coveney must grasp the nettle of a flawed housing report

On June 17, the Ombudsperson published her annual report on homelessness published in her report on homelessness in April. It interviewed 300 homeless people, and the data suggests that homelessness is increasing, particularly in Dublin and other urban areas.

The report highlights the need for urgent action to tackle homelessness, and indeed, the Government has committed to providing additional funding for housing and homelessness services. However, the report also highlights the need for a more comprehensive approach to tackling homelessness, including investments in social housing and affordable housing.

The Ombudsperson has raised concerns about the lack of data on homelessness, particularly in relation to children and young people. The report also highlights the need for better coordination and collaboration between different agencies to address homelessness.

The Ombudsperson has called on the Government to take urgent action to address homelessness, including increasing funding for social housing and affordable housing, and to implement a more comprehensive approach to tackling homelessness.

In September, the Ombudsperson published her latest report on homelessness. The report highlighted that the number of homeless people had increased by 20% in the previous year, with the highest increase in the Dublin region. The report also highlighted the need for more social housing and affordable housing, and for better coordination and collaboration between different agencies to address homelessness.

The Ombudsperson has called on the Government to take urgent action to address homelessness, including increasing funding for social housing and affordable housing, and to implement a more comprehensive approach to tackling homelessness. The report also highlighted the need for better data collection and analysis to better understand the scale and nature of homelessness.

O

I n the UK, it is not uncommon for a holiday destination to offer a beach, a golf course, or a luxury spa within its resort, but a new trend is emerging: holiday homes that are designed to offer a range of experiences beyond just the beach, the golf course, or the spa. These homes are often marketed as a way to create a luxury, all-inclusive holiday experience, with activities such as cooking classes, wine tastings, and helicopter rides included.
